Introduction

Child Domestic Labor (CDL) refers to circumstances where children accomplish domestic responsibilities, not in their own home but rather in the home of an outsider or 'business' under abusive conditions. These children work away from public scrutiny in the protection of individuals' homes, this absence of perceptibility extraordinarily builds the probable for mistreatment and misuse (Maia & Cal, 2014). When a child is inside a business' home, s/he is viably escaped opinion; bosses have all out command over their lives. This is a high-hazard circumstance for the child. Violence and misuse (of various sorts) could occur in secret, ignored by the external world. Further recently, child domestic work is measured in numerous pieces of the world as a most exceedingly terrible type of child work, characterized by the ILO Convention 182. The Government of Pakistan confirmed Convention 182, in 2001. This ties the legislature to handle the matter of child work by overhauling enactments and creating fitting approaches and plans (d'Souza, 2010).

In South Asia, child domestic labor (CDL) is socially acknowledged and normally drilled. CDL alludes to circumstances where children are locked in to do domestic undertakings in the home of an outsider or manager. Where child domestic labor is abusive and incorporates dealing, servitude, or performs like subjugation, or work that, by its tendency or the conditions in that it is done, is dangerous and prone to hurt the wellbeing, security, or ethics of the child, it comprises a worst type of child labor as characterized in the International Labor Organization (ILO) Worst Forms of Child Labor Convention (Matsuno & Blagbrough, 2006).

The Convention on the Rights of the Child perceives in Article 32 the privilege of the child "to be shielded from monetary abuse; and from some effort that is probably going to interfere with the child's exercise, or to be dangerous to the child's welfare or corporeal, psychological, ethereal, decent or communal development (Alderson, 2008). In actualizing this article, the CRC indicates that States ought to have "respect for the significant arrangements of other worldwide instruments," which alludes especially to the International Labor Office Conventions and Recommendations regarding the matter. In doing as such, the CRC hosts animated many State gatherings to likewise endorse the ILO Conventions on child labor and take authoritative activities so as to keep children from financial misuse (Thompson, 1992). Be that as it may, while laws managing the work of children have changed, change of labor arrangements has just tended to the circumstance of children working in the formal area. Change of labor arrangements has deserted the most undetectable child specialists: child domestic specialists. Since child domestic specialists are utilized inside a casual family condition they are not typically coordinated as a professional gathering inside conventional working frameworks since such reconciliation would assume an acknowledgment of the possibility of child domestic labor. In the meantime, since they are left without lawful insurance, it is hard to battle child domestic labor (Van Walsum, 2011).

In Pakistan, Child work is a genuine child rights just as an advancement matter. Child domestic work is rising as a progressively pervasive type of child work and is deceptive because of its imperceptibility. Children keep on being a wellspring of shabby work for families the nation over. This supposed commonly gainful plan has offered approach to commercialization of children's work and a progressively manipulative type of subjugation (Ali, Shahab, Ushijima, & de Muynck, 2004). In a nation with 30% populace living underneath neediness line and a deprived open division training framework CDL will undoubtedly increment except if quick advances are occupied to reduce the issue (Bittman, England, Sayer, Folbre, & Matheson, 2003). CDL is understood both in elite and non-elite homes and henceforth its developing inescapability. Anyway in Pakistan it has not been recognized as a most exceedingly awful structure in the rundown of 29 dangerous kinds of WFCL (annex) (Dennis, 1999). This is essentially because of the disposition of social acknowledgment of this type of child work whereby bosses deliberate and see it as a demonstration of kindness, however no alleviation counting instruction openings and diversion are accessible to these children. This public acknowledgment to CDL as a 'big-hearted' act to balance 'destitution' aggravates the issues and brands mediations hard to actualize and furthermore to continue. Also grown-up domestic work is substituted with CDL which is undeniably increasingly sensible and unquestionably less expensive (Sadruddin, 2011).

Besides, the objective of widespread proficiency stays subtle and school dropout rates stay huge. In a perfect world, Pakistan ought to have a law overseeing domestic child labor, however domestic labor when all is said in done (Akhtar & Razzaq, 2005). Tragically the Service of Children Act 1991 does not cover domestic child labor. Our politicians must demonstrate this will to act and take domestic child labor inside the domain of the law (Basu, 1999).

Child labor is a genuine child rights just as an improvement issue in Pakistan. Child domestic labor is rising as an increasingly pervasive type of child labor and is slippery because of its intangibility. Children keep on being a wellspring of modest labor for families the nation over. This supposed commonly valuable course of action has offered approach to work and a progressively unfair type of subjugation (Javaid, Arshad & Khalid, 2011). In a nation with 30% populace existing beneath destitution line and a poor open division instruction framework CDL will undoubtedly increment except if quick advances are engaged to shorten the issue. CDL is realized together in tip top and non-world class homes and henceforth its developing inescapability. Domestic Child Labor dwindling under the particular circumstances depicted in ILO Convention No.182 is measured inside the Worst Forms of Child Labor (WFCL). Anyway in Pakistan it has not been recognized as a worst structure in the rundown of 29 perilous kinds of WFCL (add). This is for the most part because of the frame of mind of social acknowledgment of this type of child labor whereby bosses consider and see it as a demonstration of consideration, however no alleviation including training openings and amusement are obtainable to these children (Sadrudin, 2011). This communal acknowledgment to CDL as an 'altruistic' demonstration to check 'neediness' intensifies the issues and brands intercessions hard to execute and furthermore to continue. In addition grown-up domestic labor is relieved with CDL that is unquestionably increasingly reasonable and certainly less expensive. An incredible correspondence procedure for CDL in Pakistan need to be considered in total relations of infringement, that have a penchant to change from low power maltreatment to great force brutality (Fassa, Facchini, Dall'Agnol, & Christiani, 2000).

Anyway substantial number of children from age five to fifteen is observed to be engaged with domestic child labor in Pakistan. As indicated by the overview of Federal Bureau of Statistics in 1996, all out number of children laborers is 3.3 million. Tragically these children are presented to perilous working conditions having no entrance to fundamental human needs like wellbeing, instruction and different offices (Chaudhary & Khan, 2002). Child Domestic Labor (CDL) is additionally one of the worst sorts of child labor. Indeed, wonder of Child Domestic Labor (CDL) is that of the imperceptible type of child labor (Federal Bureau of Statistics 1996).

Objectives of the Study

1. To study the Socio-economic characteristics of respondents.
2. To highlight the problems faced by child domestic labor.
3. To offer recommendations to overcome the issue of child domestic labor.

Literature Review

Child domestic laborers (for example children in domestic labor) are individuals younger than 18 who work in families of individuals other than their nearest family doing domestic tasks, thinking about children, consecutively shops and in some cases serving the business to run private ventures from home (Parreñas, 2000). This incorporates children who are paid for their work, just as the individuals who are not paid or who get in kind advantages, for example, sustenance and sanctuary (Labor, 2004). Child domestic specialists involve the biggest populace of transient. They are likewise for the most part young ladies. Children as youthful as seven years of age are routinely squeezed into domestic administration, and notwithstanding would like actually, most are denied of the chance to go to class. Child domestic laborers are secluded from their families and from chances to make companions and are under the absolute control of businesses who don't really have their best enthusiasm as an essential concern (Blagbrough, 2008).

Child domestics are children who are engaged with work as housemaids, babysitters, house-young men or 'pony young men's inside private family units. Young ladies are employed to do family unit tasks. The protection of the work makes them imperceptible laborers. Their dispersal among different family units, the absence of lawful acknowledgment for the work, its nonappearance from precise research, and from official insights, all consolidate to fortify its intangibility (Akhtar & Razzaq, 2005). The passive consent of general society everywhere to the work in Pakistan is by all accounts as a result of customary socialization, which gives the feeling that domestic work is ladies' predetermination; something that they were destined to do and in this way, domestic work can't be hurtful to children. Some will in general view it as a superior option in contrast to poverty and dejection, and in this way businesses are playing out a social commitment (Bryant, 2010).

The issue of child domestic labor is extremely perplexing and hazardous. Domestic child laborers are among the most imperceptible child laborers. The quantity of children abused in private family units is obscure as a result of the concealed idea of the work (Basu, 2000). A considerable lot of these children are young ladies and in numerous nations domestic administration is viewed as the main business choice a young lady may have. Children misused in domestic administration are paid close to nothing or nothing, are malnourished, are truly helpless against further maltreatment and abuse, and don't go to class (UNICEF., 2005). In any case, since child domestic specialists are utilized inside a casual family condition, they can't be coordinated as a professional gathering inside conventional working frameworks on the grounds that such reconciliation would assume an acknowledgment of the possibility of child domestic labor. In the meantime, without lawful activities, it is hard to battle child domestic labor. Moreover, the terms, standards and gauges to control the work of children are missing in light of the fact that children work in a to a great extent undetectable space outside law and the open circle and their domestic labor can't be incorporated under typical labor laws (Devereux & Sabates-Wheeler, 2004).

One essential motivation behind why child domestic labor is considered so risky is on the grounds that powerless children are set in a work environment another person's home that remaining parts avoided general visibility or any type of labor reviews. A huge number of family units around our very own nation don't mull over utilizing youthful children to work in their homes. One considers what number of families utilizing children remember such preconditions, including the guideline expressing that by no means should children younger than 14 be employed as laborers (Hungerland, 2007). A huge pay distinction between the child laborer and another talented laborer is generally in charge of child labor, and a similar motivating force appears to remain constant for domestic child labor. Realize that poverty might be a noteworthy reason for child labor, however poverty is additionally brought about by child labor (Edmonds & Pavcnik, 2005). A child who neglects to go to class will finish up working in modest occupations without adapting any significant aptitudes for his entire life and will thus stay poor. In any case, there is adequate motivation to trust that the marvel of domestic child labor won't finish individually accord at any point in the near future (Matsuno & Blagbrough, 2006).

According to Federal Bureau of Statistics (1996) In Pakistan expansive number of children from age five to fifteen is observed to be associated with domestic child labor. As per the study of Federal Bureau of Statistics in 1996, complete number of children specialists is 3.3 million. Tragically these children are presented to perilous working conditions having no entrance to fundamental human needs like wellbeing, instruction and different offices. Child Domestic Labor (CDL) is likewise one of the worst sorts of child labor. Truth be told, marvel of Child Domestic Labor (CDL) is that of the imperceptible type of child labor (Ghayur, 1996).

As per ILO in South Asia, child domestic labor (CDL) is socially acknowledged and usually polished. CDL alludes to circumstances where children are locked in to perform domestic undertakings in the home of an outsider or business. Where child domestic labor is exploitative and incorporates dealing, servitude, or practices like bondage, or work which, by its temperament or the conditions in which it is done, is perilous and prone to hurt the wellbeing, security, or ethics of the child, it establishes a worst type of child labor as characterized in the International Labor Organization (ILO) Worst Forms of Child Labor Convention (No. 182) (Boateng, 2017).

In accordance domestic service is an important source of wage employment for unskilled women and children belonging to low income households in urban areas. The majority of domestics have no special skill or training apart from experience gathered in the household or in their own homes (Kaur, 2007). Women and children worker in this sector, usually employed in poorly paid menial jobs such as sweeper, wane women and maids, are not protected by any contractual obligation, their service is insecure and possibilities of exploitation are high as there is usually no limit to hours of work. Working hours can be exceedingly long for domestic workers residing in the employer's house since they undertake all types of household's duties (Weiner, 2016). While the extent of women's employment in domestic service is not known, however some insight into their economic situation is provided by a survey of 680 working women in Karachi including 470 women in low income occupation of factory workers, home based workers and women who worked outside the home in the informal sector mainly as domestic servants. The findings indicate that domestic servants were the most economically vulnerable group. Their monthly wages earnings of home based workers. However, in terms of total household income they belonged to the poorest families. The importance of women's earning to family income was especially marked in the case of this group where on average their income comprised more than half of total household earning. The majority would have preferred to work in formal sector either in factories or in government organizations but their lack of education and knowledge of job opportunities relegated them to the least preferred option of domestic service (Galli, 2001).

Domestic work is often viewed as a part in which laborers are very helpless against pressure and misuse. Domestic work has included unpredictability that the working environment is somebody's home, not normal for work that happens in a perceived "work environment" condition, domestic administration happens in a situation that is probably going to be set apart by very customized relations among business and worker (De la Luz Ibarra, 2000). Formal laws, just as casual social standards administering manager, worker relations, may have less essentialness than customary and comfortable standards of conduct within the private area (Javaid et al., 2011). The labor in undocumented and untaxed, it is outside the domain of the state. The authoritative understanding, quite often between the business and the worker or managers family, is unwritten, non-official and vigorously one-sided for the business. Domestic administration is just accessible to the first class of a given network, be it a town, town or urban neighborhood and the specialist organizations are among the least fortunate and most helpless in rustic and urban culture domestic laborers close have no instruction and make no venture to enter this profession and the abilities required to perform it successfully require no formal preparing (Mantouvalou, 2006).

According to the report girl domestic servants have not yet been able to become the center of attention and recognition. A little is known and discovered about this segment of child labour population which is usually dominantly influenced by the male members of the family. In spite of hard work and labour they are not provided even sufficient food, education, health and general care in the family (Lobstein, Baur, & Uauy, 2004). On the other hand, girl domestic servants in the household employment are entirely at the mercy of the householder and granted no security or protection (Anderson, 2000). The socio economic circumstances of the families having more girls force this vulnerable group of seek financial assistance under any conditions. Subjugation of the girl within family due to boy importance in some instances and lack of educational facilities and selfishness of the parents, sometime pave the way for domestic labour. Migration from rural areas to the cities, growth of "Katchi Abadies" and slums with increased population and large family size as well as limited resources and insufficient support by male children, force families to put their female children in to vulnerable situation for economic gains. Although work performed to earn a living is justified for girls whose relatives are not in a place to assist afterward them due to certain reasons but it may interfere with their normal development and their earnings would be insufficient to support themselves and their families. Girl domestic servants are supposed to have no feelings, recognition and requirements by the employers and as a result of differential treatment from the children of the household, they suffer from a number of emotional and psychological problems (Hines, Brown, & Dunning, 2007). They feel unhappy, tired and depressed all the times, have frequent headaches, eating, sleeping problems, and lose interest in playing etc. Girl domestic servants, staying with their employer, leaving familiar home environment, may find more emotional problems than those who are living with their families (Lopez, 2006).

Conclusions

Domestic child labour in Pakistan is a thoughtful problem that desires immediate solution. Children working as domestic labour in Quetta mostly belong to poor socio-economic background. Most of them were from rural zones of the Balochistan. They are illiterate, untrained children who don't have any other choice of employed. Most of the respondent's parents were illiterate and doing daily wages job and their salaries do not fulfill the expenditure of their houses so their children were doing such type of jobs. Some of the children were employed in three to four houses because of less payment from the employer though several of them were working full time in one house. Most of them don't have the facility of their own house so it is very difficult for them to pay the rent of house. Although they belonged to deprived families some of them were forced to work as domestic labour.

The findings of the study also shows that child domestic labour has also low salary even not paid the salary in time. They are doing different type of task at house of employer. Several of them are working 6 to 7 hours daily. They are completely on the sympathy of their employer. Several of them are not allowed a single holiday in month throughout the work. They do all type of boring, difficult and unwanted works in the employers' house. Domestic child labour is often victims of physical and psychological abuse from their employer. Mostly employers have rude behavior if they commit mistake and majority of the domestic labour are verbally abused because of invisibility of the workers no one in the society. It is fact that no one in the society gives respect to domestic labour because of their poor family background. The findings of the study are also supported by literature review as mention in the above literature that poor socio- economic family background of the respondents and level of education are associated with child domestic labour.
